Support Services began the process of painting Burns Tower on Monday. It is expected to take about six weeks to complete. Parking in the immediate area of the Tower will be closed off during the process. It will be the first time the tower will be painted since it opened in 1964.

“The is a massive project that will require a lot of coordination between our building maintenance employees, the painting contractors and the employees who will be working in the tower during the summer,” said Scott Heaton, director of support services. “By the time this project is done, we estimate it will have used more than 1,300 labor-hours and 180 gallons of white paint.”

First, crews put up scaffolding and safety systems for workers, as well as a system to collect water and paint runoff from the project, to prevent contaminating the soil around the tower. Next, the entire tower has to be cleaned it before it can be painted. The cleaning process could take as many as 10 days to finish. After that, a coat of a masonry surface conditioner will go on, followed by a coat of acrylic white paint. It will take two to three weeks to complete the final phase of the project.
